3 HOUR WORKSHOP

TRANSFORMATIVE FUTURES: BUILDING INTERGENERATIONAL PARTNERSHIPS FOR SOCIAL JUSTICE AND WELL-BEING

This half-day workshop offers a deep dive into the multifaceted benefits of intergenerational collaboration using futures foresight approaches. Participants will explore the impact of youth participation on social justice, community development, and the environment. The session will include interactive activities, discussions, and futures foresight planning to foster meaningful intergenerational partnerships.

Objectives:

- Analyze the role of youth participation in advancing social justice and community well-being.
- Examine how intergenerational collaboration can address environmental and social issues.
- Develop actionable strategies for fostering effective partnerships between generations. Modified versions of these workshops for children and young people are also provided.

WORKSHOP FACILITATOR

Dr Zazie Bowen

Zazie is an anthropologist and writer, passionate about education ethnography and research with young people. After working in schools, preschools, and playgroups in Australia, Pacific, Africa and India, Zazie undertook doctoral research into young people's peer play as a cultural expression and a mode of understanding young people's social and environmental perspectives and experiences. She has hosted international conferences on childhoods and on gender in South Asia and South-east Asia at the Australian National University leading to the publication of a book and two special issue journals. She is dedicated to transformative intergenerational collaborations.
